The 2019 Range Rover Evoque is a stylish luxury subcompact SUV that sits at a unique transitional crossroads for Land Rover. Depending on where you live, a 2019 model could refer to the grand finale of the first-generation body style (primarily in North America) or the launch of the fully redesigned second-generation model (introduced in Europe). The first-generation version is notable for its sharp, angular lines and a rare, quirky two-door convertible variant, while the second-generation redesign adopts the ultra-sleek, flush-door-handle aesthetic borrowed from the larger Velar. Visually, the Evoque is defined by its dramatic, fastback-style sloping roofline and high beltline, giving it a uniquely muscular and aggressive stance on the road. This striking exterior design directly influences the interior experience; while the cabin is a masterclass in minimalist British luxury complete with premium leather, high-tech dual touchscreens, and clean lines the sloping roof significantly limits rear-seat headroom, tightens cargo capacity, and creates noticeable blind spots out the back window compared to boxier competitors like the Volvo XC40 or BMW X1. Under the hood, the 2019 Evoque is powered by a 2.0-liter turbocharged four-cylinder Ingenium engine, producing between 237 and 286 horsepower depending on the specific trim level. This power is routed through a nine-speed automatic transmission to a standard all-wheel-drive system. On the road, it delivers a firm, quiet, and sporty ride. While the nine-speed transmission can occasionally feel hesitant when trying to find the right gear for quick passing maneuvers, the vehicle completely redeems itself when the pavement ends. Thanks to Land Rovers clever Terrain Response system, which electronically optimizes traction for mud, sand, or snow, the Evoque possesses genuine off-road capability that leaves most other city-focused luxury crossovers far behind.
